In 2014, violent protests led by the right-wing opposition broke out after Venezuela’s municipal elections, causing the deaths of 43 people and hundreds injured. These attacks, called “guarimbas”, tried to overthrow the democratically-elected government of President Nicolás Maduro. A guarimba consists of blocking public roads with barricades made of barbed wire, tires, mattresses, and hanging galvanized steel wire across roads. The barricades were guarded by people carrying firearms, who assaulted citizens trying to cross the barricades. A Committee of Victims of Violent Protests was formed to demand justice for their loved ones who died or were injured. This is a special opportunity to hear from Venezuelans who have traveled to the United States on tour, gathering support for their campaign for justice and to stop the violence that continues.

Today, the right-wing dominated National Assembly is promoting a so-called “Amnesty” law to exonerate all the perpetrators of violence, many of whom have been convicted of their crimes.
